Acheron, gr. ab ἀ privat. & χαίρω gaudeo, vel ut Eust. παρὰ τὸ ἄχεα τὰ ἄχθη, quòd mœstis & luctuosis aquis fluat, ἄχος dolor, fluvius qui excipit defunctorum animas: Acheron filius Cereris absque patre, quem cùm in abdito Cretæ specu peperisset (is autem lucem aspicere non auderet) ad inferos desluxit, ibique infernalis fluvius amarissimus, qui primus excipit mortuorum animas effectus est; alii Titanis & terræ filium faciunt, & ob id a Jove ad inferos dejectum ferunt, quòd sitientibus Titanis, Lympidas præstitisset aquas; Acheron autem dicitur quasi gaudio carens: That is, wanting joy and comfort, a river so called, that is feigned to receive the souls of the deceased, because that when men are ready to dye, a certain saddish astonishment doth so subvert the minde and understanding, that death may easily be discerned to be at hand: for then the conscience and memory of things that be done, trouble the minde: which Meere, Lake, or Marish must first be passed over; nor can their minde choose but be mightily perplexed in the searching and examining of their life formerly spent. This river is sayd to be the Son of Ceres, or the earth, because the whole trouble and vexation of the minde, ariseth from the care of getting and keeping of riches. This river gave drink to the Titans fighting against Jove, because many wicked cogitations and thoughts doe arise up against the Commandements of God, which if the minde shall cherish and give way unto, he must needs rebel against the law of God, and become in nature a beast; besides, it is sayd to be of a most bitter taste, because that then the course of our former life being called to account, must needs breed bitterness and grief. Vide Nat Com. & Steph. It is also the name of divers other rivers.

when we would commend a thing for the curiousnesse of the worke: he invented the saw, the axe, the plummet, the augour, glue, cement, sailes for ships, the saile yard: he also made statues with a device to make the eyes move as if they were living: he made also the Labyrinth, into which Minos put him and his sonne Icarus, because he made a cow of wood, wherein Pasiphae being put, a bull lay with her; then he desired feathers and wax, to make a gift for the king, but he made himself and his son Icarus wings, and so flew from Creta to Sardinia, and from thence to Cuma, where he built a temple to Apollo; but Icarus soared so high, that the beames of the sun melted the wax, and his wings failed; and so by this means he fell into the Icarian sea & is called from him: Icarus Icariis nomina fecit aquis: vix. ann. mund. 2874. circ. Gedeonis tempora. The ground of this fable, is this, Dedalus being privy to the adultery of Pasiphae, the wife of Minos, by his servant Taurus, was put in prison with his son Icarus; but he escaped with his son, and some other discontented men, from Creet in some small ships: Minos pursued so hard that Icarus his ship was splitted on a rock. Dadalus oversayled the king to Sicily, being the swifter because he had then invented his sayle cloathes, when as all other men knew no speedier sayling than by the help of oares: whence the proverb, Remigiis Dædalis, to signifie a thing done with dexterity and speed.

Isaac. sic Fune. Or they were called Druides, because they had oracles from Okes, where Misseden grows. Certain Magi, Priests in France that built the city Aurelia or Orleans, a colledge, ann. mundi 2140. These were of old, the one of the two estates of France, to wit, the spirituality, to whom was committed the care of providing of sacrifices, of prescribing laws for their idolatrous worship, of the instruction and bringing up of their youth, of the studying of the arts, of deciding of controversies amongst the people, concerning the bounds of their ground, and such like. They had Okes in great estimation, and all things that grew on them, especially Misseden, which they worshiped as a thing sent unto them from heaven. The maner of their sacrifice is thus related by one: Under an Oke whereon grew Misseden, they caused meat to be prepared, and two white Bulls to be brought forth, whose horns were first bounden, i. first, set in the plough. Then the Priest being clad in white, did climb up the tree, and having a bill of Gold in his hand, did shred off the Misseden. Then offered they the sacrifice, praying that the gift might be prosperous to the receivers, supposing that the beast which was barren, if it drank of the Misseden, should be fruitful, and that it was a remedy against all poysons. It is supposed that the French borrowed this superstition from this Iland of Britain; and Tacitus saith, That they were originally in England, and thence France received them. This maner of worship (as Suetonius saith) was first prohibited in the time of Augustus, and afterward the profession was quite abolished under Claudius Cæsar. See these described by Cæs. de bel. The relation of his death, is by sundry writers thus set down: that after his death he might be feared, he stole away from his company by night, and cast himself into the mouth of the burning mountain Aetna, that so the people finding him no where, might conceive he was taken up into heaven, but the two pattens which were cast up again by the vehemency of the flame, betrayed all his policy: such desperate attempts will men undertake that do itch after honour, and are often cursed with the like cross events; he would be soon angry and then implacable, whence the proverb in both these sorts,* Empedoclis simultas. Epaminondas, a noble man of Thebes, son of Polymnus, and a valiant warrior, a man of singular knowledg in the Philosophy which Pythagoras taught, for the practise of all moral vertues; he was admired of all men in his time, and out-strip by none: it was observed in him, that he would never lie, neither in jest, nor in earnest, for his own gain. He overcame the Athenians, and the Lacedemonians, and made Thebes during his time the Empress and chief city of Greece, which was both before him and after in subjection to other people. So far may the power of one noble minded Prince, exceed the power of a whole common wealth. At last in the battle at Mantinea, between the Thebans and the Lacedemonians, he was wounded to death with a long spear, the head remaining still in his body, yet his life continued until he heard that his army had the victory, then he commanding the top of the spear to be pulled out, said, That he had lived long enough, now to dye unvanquished; and so in the great joy of his victory, his blood and soul issued out of the same wound together. At his death it was said of him, that he left onely two daughters to continue his name to posterity, i. the victories at Leuctra and Mantinea: v. TO THE READER.

COurteous Reader, I may ſeeme to ſome over bold in ſetting forth a new treaſure of words to the world, when the works of ſo honourable and learned men, who have labour'd in this kind, are ſo learnedly penned, and highly eſteemed. In truth I muſt, and doe moſt willingly confeſs, that neither in age, wit, learning or experience, I am to be compared with the leaſt of them: nay unfit to carry the books, where ſome of the honourable learned ſhould read the Lecture; whoſe learned labours have yeelded theſe many yeares to England great profit. Yet notwithſtanding, conſidering the great utility of a Dictionarie, whoſe matter is manifold, and uſe generall, and alſo that no one dictionary, as yet extant, hath the Engliſh before the latine, with a full Index of all ſuch latine words as are in any common dictionary amongſt us, & becauſe the poor eſtate of moſt ſtudents is not able to furniſh themſelves with all ſuch Dictionaries, their ſeverall prices amounting to ſo much, and alſo weighing the great want that poore ſchollers have, in not having moſt, or all of the common Dictionaries: I have thought it good therefore, for thy benefit, Courteous Reader, to epitomize and contract the learned works of the learnedſt and beſt Dictionaries in England with us now extant, into a leſſer roome, reducing all thoſe learned volumes into a portable Enchiridion, and into ſo great treaſures to caſt, for thy uſe, ſome ſmall mites of mine own, which amount to foure thouſand words more than any one dictionary now extant affords. Which I have done not without great paines and charges: which heavy burthen of charge, if it had not been ſupported by the Right Honorable, my very good Lord, the Earle of Suſſex, and the Right Worſhipfull Maſter William Waade, Eſquire one of the Clerkes of her Majeſties moſt Honourable privy Counſell, with other of my good loving pariſhioners of Bermondſey neere London, and good friends in & neere Banbury, it might have bin ſaid of me, as it was of the fooliſh builder, This man began to build, but was not able to make an end. But at laſt, though long, by Gods providence, it is come to this iſſue, that I muſt preſent it (howſoever it
